Statement of Principles to Guide Decisions on D.C. Budget

The District of Columbia faces severe economic challenges. Declining revenues have already led to the adoption of significant budget cuts in the Fiscal Year 2009 budget. The cuts affect a wide range of programs, including parks, public safety, and transportation. However, they will fall especially hard on low-income families due to reduced funding for affordable housing, homeless services, health care, and income supports.

The health and prosperity of our city depend on public investments that expand economic opportunity in our neighborhoods and support families. In these difficult times for our economy and for our citizens, careful planning is needed to make sure we can continue to meet these goals.

We, the undersigned, represent local businesses, local congregations, nonprofit organizations and advocacy organizations. We encourage city leaders to partner with concerned citizens to identify a prudent and balanced approach to managing the city's fiscal crisis.

We, therefore, submit the following principles to guide further decision-making on the D.C. budget.

Stimulate local economic recovery. The D.C. budget plays an important role in the local economy. Widespread evidence indicates that public investments that support low-income individuals and families stimulate economic recovery because beneficiaries spend the money quickly and locally. Support for human capital development, the environment, and infrastructure will help D.C. build living-wage jobs, healthy communities, and a thriving business climate.

Maintaining funding for vital public structures in D.C. is especially critical now. Public investments in the midst of a recession can support the economy and prevent economic problems from getting worse.

Avoid cutbacks that unintentionally increase costs. Safety net programs help provide stability for D.C. families and individuals who are already struggling with stagnant, low wages, layoffs and rising food, energy, medical and housing costs during this economic downturn. Cutbacks in such programs can prove to be "penny wise and pound foolish" by increasing hardship, reducing residents' buying power, and creating the need for more costly emergency services.

Include sensible revenue expansions. Program cuts are not the only way to balance a budget. Consideration of responsible revenue enhancements and D.C.'s rainy day fund should be part of the city's approach. The economic downturn offers an opportunity to review D.C.'s revenue system and identify changes that would both raise revenue and improve our tax structure.

Operate collaboratively, transparently and inclusively. The District budget has significant impacts on the local economy, the daily lives of residents and the inclusiveness and vitality of our city. Therefore, the Mayor, the City Council and the public must work together to achieve commonsense solutions that reflect our community values. District officials must address budget shortfalls in a timely manner, but not at the expense of open, informed decision-making. In particular, the process for addressing budget deficits should give interested community members complete information on proposed options and sufficient time for public response.

Working together, D.C. residents and city leaders can use their collective practical know-how, technical expertise and experience to chart a path through this financial crisis, by investing in the long-term strength of our families, our economy, and our communities.
